If you are looking for more info about my other Yahoo Widget products please go to -- When Ohio State tight end Zach Smith decided to transfer after his freshman season, it was a move that was well worth making, he said. Specifically, it was a move from Madison to Ohio State's outskirts, in Westerville. But it was also, he acknowledges, a move away from his hometown, Cincinnati. A move back to Cincinnati means he'll have to honor that part of his past. But he doesn't hesitate to admit that, if he'd stayed in Westerville, a Buckeye tight end might not have been able to keep his Ohio State legacy alive. After Ohio State defeated Michigan by a score of 52-38 on Saturday, Smith spoke with his hometown media and explained why, after his first season in Columbus, he's ending his journey and moving on. From CBS Sports Radio:Q: Bash - show contents of two files separately in order I'm looking for a simple way to process the contents of two files individually. I want to print file1's content, then use the same file2 to print the same contents as file1, but in a second column. I can do something like this to print file1's contents to a file that can be used: while read line do echo $line >> tmp1 done file2 I want to do the same thing with file2's contents. I have thought of something like this: while read line do echo $line >> tmp1 done > file2 This doesn't work, because the output of the first cat command gets overwritten by the second. I'm not sure how to do this. Any suggestions? A: A simple cat would do this: while read line do echo $line >> tmp1 done > tmp1 done cat file1 | while read line do echo $line >> tmp1 done cat tmp1 file2 You could use tee for the second loop. For example: while read line do echo $line 09e8f5149f

Never underestimate a punter or the odds and My Honest showed a great attitude on the face with the favourite as he made the most of an early break and continued through the middle of the pack to sprint clear. Following a tight pace chase, My Honest led from the first three furlongs out and went on to hold the early advantage in an early sight race as the Countryman scrum began to pile up behind. When the two were leaving the final corner, My Honest was in with a clear lead of about a length. My Honest's long-time rider, Josh Moore, once again rode like a birdie with his talented mount and the 2002 champion held the lead to the finishing line for no luck. The victory was the first win at Haydock for the gallant Paddy Power Two-year-old who was impressive throughout the afternoon. "He's a great horse to ride and Josh does a very good job for me," said My Honest's trainer, Graham Robinson. The win was worth £40,000 for the black gelding out of Glammis, whilst the top 4 finishers share £13,000. The appearance of My Honest, a son of The Yellow Press, is the big news in the race but he remains far from certain. Other winners include: Can't be a bigger day for the Thurcast: Lewis Leader's seven-length victory in the 2008 2,

The first ever cricket match of the season has been played and it was Mumbai Indians vs Chennai Super Kings. The first game of the season was a very exciting battle between two top teams as the first over was no score. The first half ended with Mumbai Indians posting a total of 154/7 in their 20 overs, while Chennai Super Kings were on the back foot. They managed to score 50 runs and lost by 89 runs.Q: Utilizing std::function in an Unistd.h class #include #include #include #include using namespace std; class UnixSignal { public: UnixSignal() {} ~UnixSignal() {} template void handle(const Func& func) { pid_t pid = (pid_t)func(); kill(pid, SIGKILL); } }; The UnixSignal uses standard unistd.h functions, so what I would like to know is if there is a way to create an object of class UnixSignal without having to pass std::bind or lambdas around for every instance. The problem is that my class relies on a const Func& so I can't use a std::function because there is no templated constructor for std::function that accepts a const
