Our aim was to test the effect of training on the difficulty of generalizing different features of a memory object to other items. A same-different task was conducted on five different categories of stimuli: categories with homogeneous stimuli (3 classes: animal or furniture), and categories with heterogeneous stimuli (2 classes: mountain or mountain valley). On each trial, subjects had to report whether two items were from the same category, or were different. Training was obtained by presenting either animals or furniture, whereas the test consisted in presenting either mountains or mountain valleys, and subjects had to report whether they were different. The control condition was the same, but presented items did not form training and test categories. In the training condition, half of the items were the same as the previous items (homogeneous training condition), whereas the other half was different (heterogeneous training condition). Training only had a small effect on generalization gradients, but homogeneous training (trained than non-trained items) resulted in a more symmetrical gradient when the test category was heterogeneous than when the test category was homogeneous. In the control condition, the gradient was symmetrical. This shows that first, training leads to a higher probability of making mistakes when the test is difficult; second, a generalization gradient more symmetrical than a control condition seems to arise from training.

File this one under “Dissing Someone’s Sense of Hipness (The First Amendment Edition)”. Former “Monday Night Football” sideline reporter Rachel Nichols has a problem with former NFL quarterback Donovan McNabb—not because he no longer plays the game (although the annoyance there is yet another), but because he’s still an active player (playing for a Pro Bowl team) and is, well, still a quarterback (meaning, he gets paid to play a game). As an honorary Green Bay Packer, let me just say that is one cold-ass expression of dissatisfaction. Donovan McNabb is not just another quarterback. He’s the first quarterback to win the Super Bowl MVP award (twice). He’s the fourth-most accurate passer in NFL history, having broken Dan Marino’s record for passer rating with the Philadelphia Eagles. He’s the second-winningest quarterback in Eagles history—and, believe me, they were not a good team to begin with—having
