The chemical compound 1,6-diphenyl-1,3,5-hexatriene (DPH) is found in biological membranes where it is a principal spectral component of the region of the spectrum of interest in fluorescence measurements of membrane probes. The compound appears as a weakly fluorescent lipid analog and has been used in a number of studies. DPH, however, is not considered to be a model system for studies of membrane thermodynamics, viscosity, and general properties because its use requires relatively large amounts of sample which are technically difficult to obtain. This proposal seeks funding for a new automated fluorescence spectroscopic system designed to measure the emission spectra of DPH and other fluorescent probes and for the apparatus necessary to develop a model of the thermodynamics of fluorescent systems in which temperature and other parameters are varied.
