The invention relates generally to asynchronous logic circuit operation, and more particularly to the design of sample-and-hold circuits for asynchronous data logging. Operation of an asynchronous digital circuit requires a means for sampling the asynchronous data signals from the circuit. A sample-and-hold circuit is used to sample the data signals and hold the sampled signals for later digital processing. Traditional sample-and-hold circuits operate asynchronously and do not permit simultaneous sampling and holding, as is desirable for typical digital signal processing. Logic operations to be performed on asynchronous data signals are often carried out by first synchronizing the signals and then sampling and holding the signals. These synchronizing and sampling and holding operations are often implemented with sample-and-hold circuits. A typical synchronizing and sampling and holding operation on an asynchronous data signal uses a clocked register and a sample-and-hold circuit. The clocked register is clocked synchronously with the incoming data signal. The clocked register is configured to store a data sample from a data pulse in the asynchronous data signal. The sample is stored in the register until all other operation on the data sample is completed. The sample-and-hold circuit is clocked synchronously with the clocked register and holds the data sample for processing. Such a synchronizing and sampling and holding operation on
