The ruling also struck down the state's most recent ban on more funding to independent groups. Robert's new ruling goes a step further than the court did in an earlier case where it ruled that putting new disclosure requirements on political spending was unconstitutional. In the new ruling, the judge found that the campaign finance system is a vital part of Arizona's democratic process, because it serves as a check on elected officials and prevents them from being bought. In a statement, U.S. District Judge David Campbell said that the court's decision is a part of a nationwide push to curb the influence of money in politics, which he called a "growing public concern." "In Arizona, this court has before it a decision that will restore that fundamental tenet of our democratic process: the people are sovereign and money is not," said Campbell. "The court's decision today will ensure that Arizona citizens have a meaningful opportunity to participate in the democratic process." Campbell's ruling came in a lawsuit brought by the Arizona Free Enterprise Club, Better Arizona and other conservative groups challenging Proposition 123, which became law earlier this year. Proposition 123 is intended to replace the state's ban on earmarking taxpayer money with party-dominated committees. Before the ban was repealed, supporters argued that political parties in Arizona could effectively pick their own candidates and get away with spending as much money as they wanted. The decision by Campbell means that Arizona taxpayers can now donate to political parties, and they can spend more than the parties' $5,000 limit on independent groups. The new ruling also means that Arizona taxpayers can donate money to independent groups that are not political parties and can spend more than $5,000 on them.
