There is a considerable need to fabricate optically transparent, electrically conductive coatings on substrates of various shapes and sizes for many different applications. For example, some solar cells, batteries, or other electrical devices, are often limited to working with devices that are transparent to the radiant energy used to generate electricity. In addition, many devices made from non-conducting substrates require conductive coatings for their operation. Examples of these applications include, but are not limited to, transparent conductive coatings on eyeglasses, capacitors, antennas, solar cells, electronic tablets, and other flat panels. Many devices have different shapes and sizes, and
