[AudioCelestia] - 05/04/14 at 10:49 pm - Connected to BBSBotâ. The operator of a Tasmanian powerline says he expects a high-profile test case in the Supreme Court to be heard within a year. The National Energy Market Operator and the Maritime and Northern Territory Police plan to carry out a search of the east coast high voltage network, from Port Lincoln to Hobart, to try to recover a laptop loaded with crucial live key card security information stolen from the national electricity market in Victoria. The search will cost hundreds of thousands of dollars and use three helicopters. The laptop contains critical technical information on how electricity flows through the Australian power system, and what equipment is required to keep it up and running. It is believed to be critical to the resumption of the NEM, the operator of which has been suspended. Steve Stab, the head of engineering for AusNet Services, said the cost of the search would be a "significant amount" of money. He believed the search could continue for a year, depending on legal challenges. "We need a legal opportunity to get into court and prove some of our assertions and see what the judges decide so we're not going to embark on this large operation until we've got the opportunity to apply to the court," he said. "That costs significant money, I think it's something between $100,000 and $200,000 and it's going to be very expensive to the market operator." The search is a "critical, essential, long-term security activity" and AusNet Services owns one-third of the high-voltage network, Mr Stab said. The NEM operator is involved in legal action against Malcom Turnbull's deputy, Slade Gutchart, for allegedly revealing highly confidential information about the NEM. Mr Stab said he was confident the Supreme Court would allow the search to take place, due to the urgency of it. "There's a lot of big-picture information in there, there's a lot of information about the system that's pretty easy to defend, information on critical production facilities, significant items that if they got out it would cause quite a bit of serious
