Lateral neck dissection (LND) is now considered the most precise and effective way to remove a dissectable cervical lymph node metastasis. It has been shown to have an improved survival compared with dissection that just resects the primary tumor. Its complication rate, which is generally low, can be reduced by using suprascapular thyroid tumor dissection (sTTD). However, there are several obstacles to the implementation of an LND or sTTD that are unique to thyroid cancer, including the risk of making a thyroid-sparing resection or of intraoperative cervical lymph node metastasis and the risk of recurrence in the lateral compartment following LND. Therefore, the principles of thyroid cancer surgery should be applied, while paying special attention to the position of the recurrent laryngeal nerve and lateral compartment neck dissection. The purpose of this review is to discuss the surgical management of the thyroid cancer patient with clinically node-positive or node-negative disease and a clinically lateral neck dissection. The authors also discuss some of the potential pitfalls and complications when performing an LND or sTTD for thyroid cancer. Chemical- and gene-directed targeting of polymeric nanoparticles in glioma using the immune system. Tumor-targeted delivery of therapeutic agents has emerged as an important strategy for 6d1f23a050
